

During Thomas's late adolescence and early 20s, he worked closely with the merchants of Nurbury to sell their catch. Lyndon was a far journey from Norbury, however, the fish caught off the coast of Norbury was a rare delicacy to the upper class of Lyndon and could be sold at a very high price.

Thomas made connections with various merchants and traders in Lyndon at the time, so once he left Norbury, Lyndon was the obvious choice for him to seek residence and business. With the money he had from being nobility and the merchant connections he had fostered, Thomas was able to purchase a building to start a business in. Thomas's chosen business venture was hospitality, and he started the Sleeping Dragon Inn.

The Sleeping Dragon Inn was a mediocre establishment at best. Thomas was ignorant of the culture of Lyndon and had no experience as a tavern owner. Thomas had gone through many unreliable workers until Edgar Holmes answered one of Thomas's job listings.

Edgar is an earth genasi who, although he hated it, worked odd construction jobs around Lyndon. Edgar is married to an air Genasi named Francis Holmes, a struggling artist in Lyndon. Edgar was searching for better and safer work when he saw Thomas's Job posting. Although Edgar had no experience working in Inns, he thought this struggling business would take a chance on him.

Thomas decided to hire Edgar, and it turned out to be the best decision he ever made for the Sleeping Dragon Inn. Edgar was great with the customers in a way Thomas could never be, and his happy personality caused many customers to return time after time.

Thomas was able to rely on Edgar to handle all of the work on the floor, while Thomas could focus on administrative tasks. The Sleeping Dragon Inn became a profitable business until Thomas had to depart. During the days leading up to Thomas's departure, Edgar could tell something was wrong. Thomas never talked about his past with Edgar; however, Edgar always knew something was wrong in Thomas's mind. Edgar would sometimes see Thomas recoil at a spilled cup of water, or freeze while washing his hands, and stare blankly at the stream of water. Despite these odd moments, Thomas was always very friendly, but before his sudden departure, Thomas had become deathly serious in an unusual way, even for a strange man like himself.

Thomas and Edgar used to share deep and personal conversations about themselves and their feeling, but Thomas began to only talk to Edgar about business, profit, and trade. Thomas's sudden distance was hurtful to Edgar, however, Edgar could not deny that he was learning much more about the inner workings of owning an inn.

One day, Thomas stopped showing up at the Inn. Edgar could not find him at his usual spots or his apartment. Edgar was sure that without Thomas in the picture, the Inn would die, and he would have to go back to working harsh construction jobs; however, when it came time to order products from local farms and distillers, Edgar was able to do it just like Thomas showed him, and when it was time to pay the guild that oversought the Inn business in Lydon Edgar was able to do that as well.

It was hard to run the Inn without Thomas, but Edgar turned the Sleeping Dragon Inn into a thriving business. Francis became a full-time bartender at the Inn, and the paintings he couldn't sell at auction hung proudly on the walls of the Sleeping Dragon Inn. Wonderful landscape paintings of foreign lands and imaginative ceramic sculptures of battling warriors created an ambiance that drew in dreamers and adventurers.

Edgar and Francis were thriving, but they had still wondered what had become of Thomas until one day Edgar received a letter. The letter told of the fate of Thomas's hometown of Norbury, as well as why Thomas departed so abruptly. The letter also contained signed documents officially handing over ownership of the Sleeping Dragon Inn to Edgar, as well as a promise that Thomas would return for a drink.